Winnipeg drone crew opens its search archive and seeks farm partners

WINNIPEG, Manitoba — When a dog goes missing, a creek bank, a treeline or the far side of a field can take hours to check on foot. HOGUE DRONE SERVICES is sharing footage from its Winnipeg-area Pet Detectives searches and inviting Manitoba producers to help shape a proposed aerial search service for farms.

The Scully search film gives viewers a pilot's-eye view of the work. The Honey and Dobie archive reels show two different settings, from snow-covered ground to a residential neighbourhood. Eric Hogue, the company's founder, is available to walk reporters through what the camera shows and how a ground team checks a possible sighting.

For farms, Hogue wants to hear where an overhead view would help a producer search for a missing animal, what information the person on the ground needs and how quickly they need it. The company's wildlife-drone artwork illustrates a development concept. Field testing and any animal-handling arrangements are separate from the existing pet-search service.

HOGUE DRONE SERVICES is also inviting experienced pilots and ground crew to discuss a proposed operator network. People interested in future franchise opportunities can request candidate information directly from Hogue. Winnipeg and surrounding Manitoba communities are the current search service area.
